Efforts to understand the language of animals using technology have ranged from a promising dolphin translation tool to the absurd WhatsYapp dog collar. Now researchers at the University of Nottingham have developed software to understand what horses are thinking and feeling.

The HABIT (Horse Automated Behaviour Identification Tool) project analyzes the behavior horses exhibit, in order to automatically identify whether the animal is stressed, sick or suffering.

"Horses and all nonhuman animals are entitled to interaction technologies that enrich rather than exploit," said Steve North, a research fellow in the Mixed Reality Laboratory (MRL) at the University of Nottingham.

The research—carried out in collaboration with Nottingham Trent University and the Open University—could eventually find real-world applications on farms, in zoos or in veterinary practises.

“We are coming to a point where technology is so widespread in society that animals are becoming exposed to it and interacting with it,” said Clara Mancini, a senior lecturer in computer interaction design at the Open University. “However, we are still in the very early stages of developing technology that can interact with them in a user-centred way.”

Parties speaking in one voice on Kashmir sent right message: PM Modi

Prime Minister Narendra Modi said political parties have spoken in one voice over the developments in Kashmir. Modi made these remarks at an all-party meeting convened ahead of the monsoon session of Parliament beginning from Monday, official sources said.
